

Rebecca Johnson brings 24 years of non-profit sector management and governance experience to the PST Board. She spent the last 12 years in public health clinic management and now consults with a Community Link Consulting, a firm in Spokane, Washington that specializes in federally qualified health centers management. Rebecca has a Masters in Non-Profit Leadership from Seattle University, a Graduate Certificate in Public Health from the University of Washington, and a Bachelor of Arts Humanities from Washington State University. A resident of Bellingham, Washington, her connection to the PST is personal. The 1999 Olympic Pipeline explosion occurred behind her home, and took the lives of 10 year olds Wade King and Stephen Tsiorvas, both neighbors and schoolmates of her children, and Liam Woods whose stepfather was the executive director of a youth agency where Rebecca was a board member.
